Through these are passed iron bolts, which go to a great depth into the solid rock. The next layer is fastened upon the first with cement and bolts of iron, and so on to the top. The whole is thus made one mass of stone and iron. The whole Titanic structure will be 10,294 feet in length, or nearly two English miles. As we have remarked above, about 3,000 feet are made upon the shores. There remains, therefore, for the bridge proper, 7,000 feet, or nearly a mile and one-third. How, then, is this vast sheet of water, flowing swift, and sometimes piled to the height of 30 feet with huge masses of ice, to be spanned? We find 24 stone piers, standing 242 feet apart, perpendicular on three sides, and sloping down to the water's edge. In exception, however, to this general statement, it should be observed that the centre span is 330 feet wide for the purpose of navigation, and is bounded by piers much larger than the others Resting, without other support, on these piers, and running from abutment, is the bridge, consisting of a great hollow iron tube, 22 feet high in the middle by 16 wide, descending to ten feet high at the two the average level of the water, thence sinking gradually towards either end, I foot in 130, thus making the height of the abutment about 37 feet And so, in these terminal masses of masonry, in these twenty-four colossal piers breasting for all time the floods of the St. Lawrence, in this enormous tube of
